Proposed prototype region for issuing debris flow Forecasts and W arnings. Initially, the prototype system will rely primarily on in other parts of the country, the main threat arises from other operational tools ( such as existing rain gages and NEXRAD ) sources, such as localized convective thunderstorms in the to monitor storm conditions. However, although the current Rocky Mountains, summer monsoon rains in Arizona, and operational weather tools and the present geological knowl-hurricane rainfall in the Appalachian Mountains. The regional edge of debris flows far exceed what was available a decade and local geology affecting debris flow varies greatly. Hence, earlier, they are known to have shortcomings that render them another important topic for the programs research is to assess less than ideal for developing Forecasts and Warnings. Thus, transferability of results from one area to another and the the warning development program and its prototype demon-specific data and observational requirements...
