Not illustrated. 1807 edition. Excerpt: . face. Her habit was simple as the village girls; but no ball-room dress, in the eyes of the traveller, ever appeared half so elegant. Every expression of pain or weariness, shown by the invalid, was answered by looks of sympathy from his gentle attendant. She re-adjusted the cushions, and he was seated; his little nurse placing herself by his side; and the servant returned to the house. Never was a sweeter picture seen: it was one of the loveliest afternoons of June; Nature was in her prime, and all her works rejoiced. In the face of the gentleman the most affectionate feelings were expressed; in that of the young girl, happiness, tenderness, and attention were mingled. She drew from her pocket a book, and began to read; though frequently she paused to change the position of a pillow, or to take the...
