Excerpt: . . . at our station, where Francis, big and burly, in well polished russet boots with the reflecting capacity of. mahogany, met me with the dog-cart. She arrived yesterday, and has shaken down like a brick. Both the boys are in love with her, and shes bent on making herself pleasant. He bluntly told me what he knew I wished to hear. anes very fond of her, too. She has any amount of intuition, has ane. Francis was developing a tiresome faculty of seeing things through his wifes eyes. If this saves him the trouble of thinking, it also makes him appear a little ridiculous, but we must pay for luxuries. anes virtue leans to the side of shrewdness, and the outlook at the Chase has become prosaic in consequence. Francis flicked the mare with his whip, and we spun away down the familiar steep road....
